

U.S. ARMY PUEBLO CHEMICAL DEPOT FACT SHEET

EMBLEM MISSION

Our Mission

Safely secure, store, and monitor the chemical stockpile while protecting the workforce, the public, and the environment; prepare for and support stockpile elimination; and transition the depot and the workforce for closure.

Pueblo Chemical Depot Logo

Throughout the years and the various missions, the name of the depot has changed. In April 2006, depot employees submitted artwork for consideration for a new depot logo. The entire work force, as well as a group of depot retirees, voted on one design that portrayed the depot's past, present and future missions. The final selection came in June 2006.

Symbolism

The colors cobalt blue and yellow gold are representative of the U.S. Army Chemical Corps. "Pueblo Depot" is representative of the installation throughout its history. "1942" is the date of establishment. "Safety" and "Service" capture the continued and historical depot missions.

The branch insignia of both the U.S. Army Chemical Corps and Ordnance Corps represent the depot's command structure through its history as both an ordnance and a chemical depot.

The hawk represents native depot wildlife, the present and future mission of the environmental programs, and was also the name of one of the missile systems supplied by the depot during its missile mission in the 1950s and 60s.

The Pershing Missile in the center represents one of the most prominent missions of the depot in the 1980s.

The setting sun is portrayed to the south of Pike's Peak as seen from Pueblo.

The mountain has been an element that has graced many of the past depot emblems, representing Pike's Peak.
